Since early childhood, I have always loved playing chess. There is something uniquely charming about the ability to strategize and make plans several steps ahead of my rival, giving me control and confidence in the outcomes. As years went by, I started applying many valuable skills and techniques from chess to my studies and career aspirations. Yet, the main focus in my planning has always been on the power of outperforming the competitors by foreseeing further steps and thinking about the future.

I made up my mind to become a lawyer in middle school—a decision that startled my parents. They waited for some time before finally accepting my choice and making the proper arrangements for my extracurricular law classes and college admission training. On my part, I have always been sure that I was born to be a lawyer and never explored any alternatives, instead preferring to dedicate all my energy and resources to becoming a superior legal professional.

The moment when I was ready to enroll in college coincided with COVID-19. To say that my plans were ruined would be a huge understatement. As the world was sliding into a global lockdown and colleges were struggling with the massive transition to remote education, I could not hit the enrolment targets planned earlier. It took me half a year to realize that my rigidity in career plans and aspirations led me to depression and made me lose a year of study because of my inability to adapt to the changing life conditions.

However, as a life-long strategist, I have managed to refocus on the initial plan to become a lawyer and seized the remote course opportunity during the COVID-19 pandemic. I studied harder than ever, trying to catch up with the lost year and graduating with two majors one year earlier than scheduled. As I worked towards my degree, I developed the skills of adaptability, flexibility, and responsiveness that became instrumental in my higher education.
