

Friendship

There is hardly a person who does not value friendship and accepts its critical importance. Life offers multiple challenges to individuals, and sometimes it can be rather challenging to face and overcome them; however, true friends are always ready to help and move forward, regardless of all problems that exist at the moment. I believe everyone has a story about some relations and how they helped to survive in some most complicated moments. I am not an exception, and my experience allows me to state that friendship is one of the most significant values available to people as having a friend means being supported in various ways.

The importance of friendship is recognized not at once. Children do not pay much attention to the given concept, its true meaning, or the role friends play in their lives. They just prefer to spend more time with people who attract them and who amuse them. They do not think about the qualities and features that make these individuals attractive to them or the support they provide day by day during meetings. It can be explained by the lack of experience and real challenges that should be solved independently, without the help of parents. However, growing up and facing the first problems, people start to notice the critical importance of friends who are always ready to help.

This idea comes from my own experience. Being a child, I did not appreciate the relations that existed between my close friends and me. I took them for granted as an integral part of every person's life and enjoyed time with them. However, with the start of independent life and studying, their real value became obvious. The transition from childhood to adulthood is one of the most complex periods in the life of individuals as their old visions and representations are replaced by new, more relevant ones, which can be followed by disillusionment and depression. During this phase, people often find new friends who share the same values and perspectives on the future. They are united because it is always easier to struggle together, and they also become best friends till the end of their lives.

I remember myself during the given stage and the difficulties I had. Confusion, loneliness, and the lack of confidence in the future were the main aspects impacting my moods and motivation to move forward. However, I was lucky to meet a real friend and share these feelings with him, which became a great relief and, at the same time, altered my attitude to life. The importance of friendship is also explained by the fact that other people might have different traits of character and attitudes, which are vital for a person at the moment and can help him or her to move forward. From this perspective, my friend helped me to see my future life as a journey full of opportunities and joy.

Today, we are still good friends and help each other to share our problems, resolve them, and keep moving. Correctly realizing the outstanding role of this person in my life, I should say that friendship is one of the most important values in the life of every person as it helps to deal with all challenges and move forward, accepting the fact that the world can be threatening, but there are always people who are ready to help you.
